Original proceeding in mandamus.

Argued and submitted January 11, 2011.

Charles F. Hinkle, Stoel Rives LLP, Portland, argued the cause and filed the briefs for Intervenors-Relators/Intervenors-Adverse Parties The Associated Press, The Oregonian, Oregon Public Broadcasting, The New York Times, KGW, and Courthouse News Service.

Robert L. Aldisert, Perkins Coie LLP, Portland, argued the cause and filed the briefs for Defendants-Relators/Defendants-Adverse Parties The Boy Scouts of America.

Lori Irish Bauman, Ater Wynne LLP, Portland, filed the brief for amicus curiae TechAmerica. With her on the brief was Frank V. Langfitt.

Erin K. Olson, Portland, filed the brief for amici curiae National Center for Victims of Crime, Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, Jewish Board of Advocates for Children, Inc., Child Protection Project, Child Victims Voice, Oregon Abuse Advocates and Survivors in Service, Oregon Anti-Crime Alliance, Crime Victims United, and Oregon Trial Lawyers Association. With her on the brief was Marci A. Hamilton, Washington Crossing, Pennsylvania.

Denise G. Fjordbeck, Attorney-in-Charge, Salem, filed the brief for amicus curiae State of Oregon.

DURHAM, J.

The alternative writs of mandamus are dismissed.

1 DURHAM, J.

2 These opposing petitions for writs of mandamus challenge a trial court 3 order allowing the release, to the press and to the public, of redacted versions of 1,247 4 "ineligible volunteer" files belonging to defendant Boy Scouts of America (BSA). Those 5 files contain information regarding child sexual abuse complaints against BSA volunteers
6 from 1965 to 1985. The trial court had admitted the files, and BSA's actions in response 7 to those complaints, into evidence in the jury trial of the matter below. To decide these 8 mandamus petitions, we must examine the contours of the "open courts" clause of Article 9 I, section 10, of the Oregon Constitution. That clause provides, in part:

10 "No court shall be secret, but justice shall be administered, openly 11 and without purchase, completely and without delay[.]"

12 For the following reasons, we dismiss both writs.

13 These mandamus petitions arise out of a tort action brought against the 14 Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints and the BSA by six former Boy Scouts who 15 alleged sexual abuse by their scout leaders.<sup>1</sup> One of those former scouts, Lewis, severed 16 his claims from the other plaintiffs' claims and the matter proceeded to trial. During 17 pretrial discovery, plaintiffs requested that BSA produce its ineligible volunteer files.
18 After BSA objected, plaintiffs moved to compel production of the files. The trial court 19 granted plaintiffs' motion to compel and ordered BSA to produce all unredacted ineligible 20 volunteer files covering the period 1965 to 1985, subject to a protective order. The 21 protective order required the parties to keep the files confidential and prohibited

1 distribution of the files. The order also required that all copies be returned to BSA within 2 90 days after a judgment or order terminating the action.

3           The trial court conducted a bifurcated trial of Lewis's claims. During phase 4 one, the jury heard evidence related to liability, compensatory damages, and liability for 5 punitive damages. During that phase, Lewis offered all 1,247 files into evidence, each 6 file as a separate exhibit. Each file apparently contains information related to one alleged 7 perpetrator of abuse, not one act of abuse and not one victim of abuse. The court 8 received each file into evidence, over BSA's objections. Lewis discussed many of the 9 ineligible volunteer files in the presence of the jury during trial, and all files accompanied 10 the jury into the jury room for consideration during deliberations. At the conclusion of 11 phase one, the jury awarded compensatory damages in the amount of $1.4 million and 12 found BSA liable to Lewis for punitive damages. At the conclusion of phase two, the 13 jury returned a verdict of over $18 million in punitive damages.<sup>2</sup> After trial, the trial 14 court entered another protective order, continuing the restrictions of its previous 15 protective order until further order of the court.

16           Following the verdict, plaintiffs moved to vacate the protective order so 17 that they could release the ineligible volunteer files to the public. Previously six media 18 entities<sup>3</sup> had moved to intervene and also asked the trial court to release the trial exhibits, 19 including the 1,247 ineligible volunteer files, for immediate public access. The trial court

<sup>2</sup> BSA and plaintiffs report that they settled the action after filing these mandamus petitions. The details of the settlement play no role in our decision here.

1 heard those motions together.

2 In an opinion and order dated June 18, 2010, the trial court granted 3 plaintiffs' motion to vacate the protective order and granted intervenors' motion to release 4 the trial exhibits, subject to two conditions: (1) "redaction of the names of the victims
5 and those who reported alleged abuse"; and (2) a "stay in the effectiveness of this Order 6 pending appellate review." The trial court concluded that Article I, section 10, required 7 the release of the ineligible volunteer files, reasoning that Article I, section 10, 8 encompassed "the right of the public and the press to know what evidence is presented in 9 Court proceedings and is available for consideration by the jury in reaching its verdict."
10 The trial court accorded significance to the differences between Oregon's open courts 11 clause and the open courts clause of Indiana, upon which Oregon's clause was based: 12 "Th[e] strengthening of the language clearly evidences the intent of the framers to have 13 public access be the hallmark of Oregon's court system."

14 The trial court also addressed defendants' separate argument that, if Article 15 I, section 10, did not compel the court to provide public access to the disputed files, then 16 the question of public access to trial exhibits was a matter governed by the trial court's 17 discretion. The trial court determined that it was appropriate for the court to consider 18 how it would exercise any available discretion regarding the possible release of exhibits 19 in the event that a reviewing court determined that Article I, section 10, did not require 20 the court to grant access to the files.

21 The court considered an array of factors that the parties offered to influence 22 the court's discretionary choices. The court stated:

23 "Defendants cite the following factors that support Defendants'

1 claim that the Court should exercise its discretion to deny the motions:
2 Prejudice to Defendants in terms of the opportunity of Defendants to 3 receive a fair trial of the remaining cases; prejudice to third parties, in 4 particular victims of sexual abuse who wish to remain anonymous; 5 prejudice to alleged perpetrators considering that the exhibits do not exist 6 only on account of criminal convictions or other adjudications of 7 responsibility by the individuals who are the subject of the files; the lack of 8 prejudice to the remaining Plaintiffs; and the salutary effect assurances of 9 confidentiality have on the willingness of individuals to report alleged 10 abuse.

11 "Plaintiffs and Amici respond that lifting the veil of secrecy on child 12 sexual abuse is the primary method by which the child sexual abuse 13 problem in our society will be reduced, minimized, or hopefully eradicated.
14 Plaintiffs and Amici support redaction of the names of the alleged victims.
15 Plaintiffs also support the redaction of the names of those who reported the 16 alleged abuse. Intervenors claim the right to the unredacted files in the 17 form they were received into evidence."

18 The court then explained how it would exercise its discretion to release the 19 files in a redacted form if the constitution did not require release of the files in an 20 unredacted form:

21 "Considering the factors noted above, the Court concludes that if 22 Article I, Section 10 of the Oregon Constitution does not require the Court 23 to grant the motions, the Court would nevertheless exercise its discretion to 24 do so, in a manner as qualified below. I come to this conclusion 25 considering fully and carefully the claims of Defendants and the assertions 26 of Plaintiffs and Amici, cited above.

27 "Despite the Court's conclusions noted above about the 28 Constitutional requirements, I conclude, as urged by Plaintiffs and to some 29 degree by Amici, that in the exercise of the Court's inherent power to 30 control its proceedings, the protection of alleged child sexual abuse victims 31 and the reasonable expectations of those who reported alleged child 32 [sexual] abuse require that any release of these files be a qualified release, 33 that is, with the names of all victims and the names of those who reported 34 abuse redacted."

35 The court stayed the effectiveness of its order so that the status quo would be maintained 36 while the parties and intervenors sought relief in this court.

1           Soon thereafter, intervenors filed a mandamus petition in this court, asking 2 this court to order the trial court immediately to release the ineligible volunteer files, in 3 their unredacted form, for public inspection. BSA opposed intervenors' petition and filed 4 its own petition challenging the trial court's decision to vacate the protective order and 5 release the ineligible volunteer files at all. The matters were consolidated, and this court 6 issued alternative writs of mandamus in both matters.

7           Intervenors argue that the trial court's decision to redact the ineligible 8 volunteer files and to delay the files' release until after appellate review violated Article I, 9 section 10. Intervenors contend that Article I, section 10, requires public access to trial 10 exhibits and affords the trial court no discretion in deciding whether to allow the public to 11 review that evidence in full. According to intervenors, Article I, section 10, requires that 12 all documentary evidence reviewed by the trier of fact must be available to the public in 13 exactly in the same form as that reviewed by the trier of fact. Intervenors also argue that 14 Article I, section 10, requires immediate public access and, therefore, the trial court's 15 decision to stay its order releasing the files pending appellate review also violates Article 16 I, section 10. Intervenors ask this court to issue a peremptory writ of mandamus directing 17 the trial court to make the unredacted ineligible volunteer files immediately available for 18 public inspection.

19           BSA contends, in its own mandamus petition, that the trial court erred in 20 vacating the protective order because Article I, section 10, does not create a public right 21 to obtain evidence. Instead, BSA argues, Article I, section 10, concerns only the public's 22 right to attend judicial proceedings. BSA argues that a review of the text of the 23 provision, its history, and case law interpreting the provision supports its interpretation of 1 Article I, section 10.<sup>4</sup> BSA also argues that the trial court abused its discretion in 2 releasing the ineligible volunteer files because the trial court failed to consider BSA's 3 evidence about the repercussions of releasing the files. For those reasons, BSA urges this 4 court to issue a peremptory writ of mandamus directing the court to vacate its order 5 releasing the ineligible volunteer files.

6 Mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, used to enforce a clear legal right.
7 State v. Burlison, 342 Or 697, 701, 160 P3d 624 (2007). A writ of mandamus "shall not 8 control judicial discretion." ORS 34.110. Mandamus may be appropriate, however, 9 where the trial court's action falls outside the "permissible range of discretionary choices 10 open to [it]." Burlison, 342 Or at 702.

11 We address BSA's mandamus petition first. BSA contends that Article I, 12 section 10, does not create a right of access to trial exhibits. Applying the methodology 13 set forth in Priest v. Pearce, 314 Or 411, 415-16, 840 P2d 65 (1992), BSA analyzes the 14 text of the constitutional provision, the historical circumstances leading to its adoption, 15 and the case law interpreting the provision. According to BSA, that analysis mandates 16 the conclusion that Article I, section 10, requires open court proceedings but does not 17 require access to trial evidence. As outlined above, BSA also argues, in the alternative, 18 that the trial court had discretion to decide whether to release the exhibits but abused its 19 discretion by granting intervenors' motion to vacate the protective order, thereby 20 releasing the ineligible volunteer files, albeit in a redacted form, to the public.

<sup>4</sup> The Attorney General, appearing as amicus curiae, agrees with BSA that the text, history, and case law indicate that Article I, section 10, refers only to in-court proceedings and that Article I, section 10, includes no public right to obtain trial evidence.

1           As we discuss later in this opinion, we agree that Article I, section 10, does 2 not compel the trial court to release to the public trial exhibits that are subject to a 3 protective order or entitle the public to have access to trial exhibits at the close of trial.
4 We also assume the correctness of defendants' alternative contention that, if a right to 5 inspect exhibits exists, then the trial court has discretion to determine the conditions for 6 the release of the exhibits for public inspection.<sup>5</sup> However, contrary to defendants' 7 contentions, we do not agree that the trial court abused its discretion in this case when it 8 vacated its earlier protective order and required release of the exhibits in a redacted form.

9           To begin, we find nothing in Article I, section 10 -- and BSA points to 10 nothing -- that prohibits the trial court from releasing the ineligible volunteer files to the 11 public. Neither does BSA point to any statute or other authority that prohibited the trial 12 court from vacating its own protective order and releasing the ineligible volunteer files.
13 The issuance and vacation of protective orders are matters of a trial court's discretion.
14 See ORCP 36 C (granting court discretion to make any discovery order "which justice 15 requires to protect a party or person from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or 16 undue burden or expense").

17           BSA nevertheless argues that the trial court's order was an "abdication of its 18 duty to administer justice and contrary to reason." BSA asserts that the trial court failed 19 to give reasons for its decision and disregarded the public policies that would be 20 undermined by releasing the ineligible volunteer files. BSA contends that it presented 21 evidence regarding the effect of the release of the ineligible volunteer files on the alleged

<sup>5</sup> This court adopted a similar assumption in State ex rel KOIN-TV v. Olsen, 300 Or 392, 711 P2d 966 (1985), which we discuss in greater detail later in this opinion.

1 victims named in the files and that the trial court "ignored" that evidence. The trial 2 court's decision to redact the names of the alleged victims, however, belies BSA's 3 assertion that the trial court "ignored" that evidence. BSA also argues that the trial court
4 failed to give proper weight to its arguments about the effect of the files' release on BSA's 5 ability to defend itself in pending cases. We disagree. The trial court considered that 6 argument and rejected it, stating, "The problem with this argument by [BSA] is that it is 7 speculation, with nothing concrete to support it other than its bare assertions." In short, 8 BSA has not demonstrated that the trial court's decision to vacate the protective order and 9 release the ineligible volunteer files was an abuse of discretion. BSA thus has failed to 10 show that it is clearly entitled to the mandamus remedy it seeks. We therefore dismiss 11 the alternative writ issued in response to BSA's mandamus petition.

12           We now turn to intervenors' mandamus petition. As stated earlier, 13 intervenors argue that Article I, section 10, required the trial court to release unredacted 14 ineligible volunteer files, in the same form as they were admitted as exhibits at trial. To 15 resolve intervenors' petition, therefore, we must decide whether Article I, section 10, 16 requires the court, at the end of a trial and upon request, to release for inspection 17 documents received in evidence and considered by the jury.

18           We interpret a constitutional provision by examining the text of the 19 provision, the historical circumstances leading to the creation and adoption of the 20 provision, and the applicable case law concerning the provision. *Clarke v. OHSU*, 343 21 Or 581, 590, 175 P3d 418 (2007) (citing Priest, 314 Or at 415-16). In that process of 22 interpretation, we attempt to understand the provision, if possible, as the framers would 23 have understood it. We then apply the constitutional principles that we discern from our

1 inquiry to modern circumstances as they arise. See Smothers v. Gresham Transfer, Inc., 2 332 Or 83, 90-91, 23 P3d 333 (2001).

3 Article I, section 10, provides:

4 "No court shall be secret, but justice shall be administered, openly 5 and without purchase, completely and without delay, and every man shall 6 have remedy by due course of law for injury done him in his person, 7 property, or reputation."

8 Within Article I, section 10, are two independent clauses. Smothers, 332 Or at 91. We 9 are concerned with the first independent clause of Article I, section 10, the so-called 10 "open courts" clause, which states: "No court shall be secret, but justice shall be 11 administered, openly and without purchase, completely and without delay[.]" We have 12 explained that "[t]he first clause of Article I, section 10, * * * prescribes how justice must 13 be administered in Oregon by identifying both a prohibition (no court shall be secret) and 14 a directive (justice must be administered openly, completely, and without purchase or 15 delay)." Smothers, 332 Or at 91. Within that first clause, two phrases are particularly 16 pertinent here: (1) "[n]o court shall be secret," and (2) "justice shall be administered, 17 openly." For the purpose of our inquiry, the key terms in the open courts clause are 18 "court," "secret," and "openly." We begin our textual inquiry by considering the ordinary 19 meaning of those terms, as the framers would have understood them, including, as 20 appropriate, any pertinent definitions that may have appeared in contemporaneous 21 dictionaries. See Smothers, 332 Or at 92 (citing contemporaneous standard and law 22 dictionaries to interpret remedy clause of Article I, section 10).

23 The first phrase of the open courts clause states: "No court shall be secret."

24 The term "court" appears in several passages of the Oregon Constitution, either by itself,

1 as in Article I, section 10, or as part of the phrase "Court of Justice." See, e.g., Or Const, 2 Art I, § 6 ("No person shall * * * be questioned in any Court of Justice touching his 3 religious [sic] belief to affect the weight of his testimony."); Or Const, Art I, § 11 (in 4 criminal prosecution, the accused "may elect to waive trial by jury and consent to be tried 5 by the judge of the court alone"); Or Const, Art I, § 44(1)(a) (term of imprisonment 6 imposed "by a judge in open court may not be set aside or otherwise not carried out"
7 subject to stated exceptions). The constitution addresses some of those references, either 8 expressly or by implication, to specific courts within the judicial branch of the 9 government. Or Const, Art I, § 11 ("[I]n the circuit court ten members of the jury may 10 render a verdict * * *."); Or Const, Art 1, § 42 (identifying rights of victims in "criminal 11 and juvenile court delinquency proceedings"); Or Const, Art VII (Amended), § 1 ("The 12 judicial power of the state shall be vested in one supreme court and in such other courts 13 as may from time to time be created by law.").

14           Despite the slight variations in usages noted above, the term "court" in the 15 Oregon Constitution refers to a legally established institution designed and authorized to 16 administer justice. A dictionary, in wide use in 1859, confirms that the framers likely 17 understood a "court" to consist of both the place where that institution administers justice 18 as well as the judges and other persons who are charged by law with the administration of 19 justice. Noah Webster, 1 An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828) 20 (reprint 1970) defines "court," as pertinent, in this way:

21           "4. The hall, chamber or place where justice is administered. * * * 6. The 22 persons or judges assembled for hearing and deciding causes, civil, 23 criminal, military, naval or ecclesiastical; as a court of law * * * . Hence, 24 7. Any jurisdiction, civil, military or ecclesiastical."

1 (Emphasis in original.)

2 A legal dictionary, also in use contemporaneously with adoption of the 3 Oregon Constitution, defines "court" by drawing attention to the importance of the 4 presence of judges and their subordinate clerical staff in the place identified as a court, as 5 well as their performance of the functions of a court in the administration of justice.

6 According to John Bouvier, 1 A Law Dictionary Adapted to the Constitution and Laws of 7 the United States of America 246-47 (1839) (2d reprint 2000):

8 "[A] court is an incorporeal political being, which requires for its 9 existence, the presence of judges, or a competent number of them, and a 10 clerk or prothonotary, at the time during which, and at the place where it is 11 by law authorised to be held; and the performance of some public act, 12 indicative of a design to perform the functions of a court. In another sense, 13 the judges, clerk or prothonotary, counsellors and ministerial officers, are 14 said to constitute the court. According to Lord Coke, a court is a place 15 where justice is judicially administered. The judges alone, are also called 16 the court[.]"

17 (Citations omitted.)

18 Those definitions indicate that, within the meaning of Article I, section 10, 19 a "court" is a governmental institution, composed of judges and their supporting staff, 20 whom the law charges with the responsibility to administer justice. This court, in 21 describing that institution, has stated that "[t]he fundamental function of courts is to 22 determine legal rights based upon a presentation of evidence and argument." Oregonian
23 Publishing Co. v. O'Leary, 303 Or 297, 303, 736 P2d 173 (1987). Our cases uniformly 24 have applied the "open courts" provision to the circuit courts of this state. See, e.g., id. at 25 305 (Article I, section 10, prohibits circuit court from closing criminal trial to receive 26 witness testimony in private); State ex rel Oregonian Pub. Co. v. Deiz, 289 Or 277, 613 27 P2d 23 (1980) ("open court" clause of Article I, section 10, prohibits a circuit court judge

1 from barring the press from attending a juvenile court proceeding). We do so here as 2 well.

3           We consider the meanings of the constitutional terms "secret" and "openly" 4 together, because they address the same concept. A contemporaneous standard 5 dictionary defines the term "secret" as "[p]roperly, separate; hence, hid; concealed from 6 the notice or knowledge of all persons except the individual or individuals concerned" 7 and "unseen; private; secluded; being in retirement." Webster, 2 An American Dictionary
8 at 66. Not surprisingly, the dictionary defines "openly" as the opposite of secret: 9 "[p]ublicly; not in private; without secrecy." Id. at 26. Those definitions, considered in 10 the context of Oregon's judicial system, confirm that Oregon's framers sought to require 11 the courts to conduct the business of administering justice in public -- that is, in a manner 12 that permits public scrutiny of the court's work in determining legal controversies. See 13 David Schuman, Oregon's Remedy Guarantee: Article I, Section 10 of the Oregon 14 Constitution, 65 Or L Rev 35, 38 (1986) (hereafter Schuman) ("Oregon evidently took 15 'open' to mean 'non-secret' or 'accessible to scrutiny,' instead of 'non-exclusive' or 16 'accessible to all regardless of ability to pay.'").

17           Without question, the first phrase of the open courts clause of Article I, 18 section 10, focuses explicitly on the court as the institution that administers justice and 19 prohibits that institution from concealing the administration of justice from public view.
20 The second phrase, "justice shall be administered, openly," similarly mandates the 21 publicly visible and audible administration of justice. As we discuss below, our cases 22 have recognized that the command for openness in Article I, section 10, is subject to 23 qualification for some aspects of court proceedings that, by well-established tradition,

1 were and are conducted out of public view, as long as the framers intended the tradition
2 of secrecy as to those proceedings to persist despite adoption of Article I, section 10.
3 O'Leary, 303 Or at 304 (discussing nonpublic jury deliberations and collegial court 4 conferences). The problem that we face is that, despite the phrasing of Article I, section 5 10, and the historical exceptions to that provision recognized in our cases, the 6 constitutional text furnishes no explicit answer to intervenors' claim of a right to obtain 7 the release of trial exhibits that a jury considered during its deliberations.

8           We turn next to the historical circumstances surrounding the adoption of 9 the open courts clause. The probable source for the open courts clause is Chapter 40 of 10 the Magna Carta. See id. at 301 n 3 ("The probable genesis of section 10 was Article 40 11 of the Magna Carta[.]" (citation omitted)). Translated, Chapter 40 provides, "To no one 12 will we sell, to no one will we deny, or delay, right or justice." Id. (citation omitted). In 13 his Second Institutes, Lord Coke commented on and interpreted Chapter 29 of the Magna 14 Carta of 1225, which previously had appeared as Chapters 39 and 40 of the Magna Carta
15 of 1215. Smothers, 332 Or at 94-95. Coke's commentary provided the basis for the open 16 courts clause of many state constitutions, including the Oregon Constitution. O'Leary, 17 303 Or at 301 n 3. Lord Coke wrote:

18           "And therefore every subject of this realme [sic], for injury done to 19 him in [goods, lands, or person], by any other Subject, be he ecclesiastical, 20 or temporall [sic], free, or bond, man, or woman, old, or young, or be he 21 outlawed, excommunicated, or any other without exception, may take his 22 remedy by the course of the law, and have justice and right for the injury 23 done him, freely without sale, fully without any deniall [sic], and speedily 24 without delay."

25 Edward Coke, 1 The Second Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England, 55 (1797).

26 Lord Coke's commentary on Chapter 29 was apparently motivated by a desire to combat

1 judicial abuses, such as the sale, delay, and denial of common-law justice through 2 corruption and interference by the King or his ministers. Coke advocated that each 3 person have access to courts to obtain a remedy by due course of law, with assurance that 4 the king would not sell, deny, or delay justice. Smothers, 332 Or at 96-97.

5           The desire for judicial impartiality and independence also apparently 6 motivated the early American adoption of open courts clauses, which were based on Lord 7 Coke's interpretation. Because Coke's concerns focused on access to courts, the mandate 8 that courts be "open" in early American state constitutions generally may have referred to 9 access to courts by litigants, not necessarily to a court's secrecy or its susceptibility to 10 public scrutiny, as it has been understood more recently. O'Leary, 303 Or at 301 n 3; 11 Schuman, 65 Or L Rev at 38. One early American constitution, the Pennsylvania 12 Constitution, echoed Coke's phrasing and provided, "That all courts shall be open, and 13 every man, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have 14 remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial 15 or delay." Pa Const, Art 9, § 11 (1790); O'Leary, 303 Or at 301 n 3 (internal quotation 16 marks and citation omitted).

17           Indiana adopted similar language in Article I, section 12, of its 1851 18 constitution, upon which Oregon's open courts clause is based: "All courts shall be open; 19 and every man, for injury done to him in his person, property, or reputation, shall have 20 remedy by due course of law. Justice shall be administered freely, and without purchase; 21 completely, and without denial; speedily, and without delay." The framers of the Oregon 22 Constitution rephrased the Indiana provision, however, to state that "[n]o court shall be

1 secret,"<sup>6</sup> and add that "justice shall be administered, openly." Or Const, Art I, § 10 2 (emphasis added). We agree with the trial court that those changes in wording from the 3 Indiana provision carry meaning. It appears clear to us that the framers of the Oregon 4 Constitution were concerned with access to Oregon courts by its citizens, as might be 5 assumed based on the historical origins of the clause, and were concerned equally with 6 combating secrecy in the administration of justice and fostering judicial accountability 7 through public scrutiny of court proceedings. The open courts clause of the Oregon 8 Constitution thus protects both a litigant's access to court to obtain legal redress and the 9 right of members of the public to scrutinize the court's administration of justice by seeing 10 and hearing the courts in operation.

11           The historical circumstances that led to the adoption of Oregon's open 12 courts provision, like the text of the Article I, section 10, itself, do not provide a clear 13 answer to the issue posed in this case. The parties, however, rely on three cases from this 14 court interpreting Article I, section 10, to support their competing positions. We turn 15 next to a consideration of those cases.

16           In Deiz, a newspaper and its reporter sought court permission to attend a 17 controversial juvenile court proceeding. The trial judge barred the press from the 18 courtroom, relying on a statute that authorized exclusion of the general public from 19 juvenile proceedings unless the judge determined that a particular person had "a proper <sup>6</sup>           The first draft of Article I, section 10, used the word, "tribunal," instead of "court." Claudia Burton and Andrew Grade, A Legislative History of the Oregon Constitution of 1857 -- Part I (Articles I & II), 37 Willamette L Rev 469, 516 (2001). The subsequent versions used the word "court." Id. The reasons for the change are unknown, and no debate took place regarding this clause. Id. That change does not affect our analysis of the open courts clause in this case.

1 interest in the case or the work of the court." 289 Or at 279 (quoting former ORS 2 419.498(1) (1979), repealed by Or Laws 1993, ch 33, § 373). The company and the 3 reporter sought relief in mandamus to nullify the exclusion order.

4 This court first concluded that the trial judge had acted within her statutory 5 authority in excluding the press. Id. at 281 The court then turned to Article I, section 10.
6 The court noted that Article I, section 10, applies to all judicial proceedings, not 7 particular categories of proceedings. Id. at 283. The court also observed that Article I, 8 section 10, expresses a principle regarding the open administration of justice for the 9 benefit of the entire public, and not a mere individual right to an open court that a litigant 10 in a specific case could waive or fail to assert. Id. at 282. The court concluded that the 11 trial judge's exclusion order violated Article I, section 10. Id. at 284.

12 The court in Deiz, however, added that its holding did not create a 13 constitutional right to attend all judicial proceedings:

14 "One obvious limitation is that jury deliberations and court 15 conferences have been and are held in private. We are of the opinion that 16 despite the absence of any language in Art I, § 10 expressly excluding jury 17 deliberation from the prohibition against secret deliberations, the tradition 18 that such proceedings be held in private was so long and so well established 19 in 1859 that the tradition should be read into the section. The same is true 20 of conferences of collegial courts."

21 Id. at 284 (citations omitted). The court also stated that the trial court retained authority 22 to control access to the courtroom by the press or public to prevent overcrowding or 23 interference with court proceedings. Id. at 285.

24 In a concurring opinion, Justice Linde drew attention to the importance of 25 public visibility in the administration of justice:

26 "As the Court's opinion sets forth, Oregon's Constitution guarantees

1 the open and visible administration of justice, not only honest and complete 2 and timely justice, but justice that can be seen to be so during and after the 3 event."

4 Id. at 286 (Linde, J., concurring). Justice Linde noted that the rights of the press and the 5 public under the free expression guarantee in Article I, section 8,<sup>7</sup> and rights of the 6 accused under Article I, section 11,<sup>8</sup> were "guarantees of personal freedom against 7 oppressive governmental power." Id. at 288. But Article I, section 10, according to 8 Justice Linde,

9 "plays a different role. It is one of those provisions of the constitution that 10 prescribe how the functions of government shall be conducted. * * * Here 11 it is the judicial function, that function which brings the law to bear on 12 individuals and puts the generalities of policy to the test of the concrete 13 case."

14 Id.

15 Justice Linde explained that the constitutional requirement of visibility in 16 the administration of justice was important in the context of both civil and criminal 17 justice. Referring to the function of openness in the administration of criminal justice, 18 Justice Linde stated:

19 "There it serves to assure accountability for the charge not prosecuted, the 20 reduced plea accepted, the evidence used or not used, and particularly to 21 forestall suspicion that political considerations entered a case behind closed

<sup>7</sup> Article I, section 8, of the Oregon Constitution provides:

"No law shall be passed restraining the free expression of opinion, or restricting the right to speak, write, or print freely on any subject whatever; but every person shall be responsible for the abuse of this right."

<sup>8</sup> Article I, section 11, provides, in part:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right to public trial by an impartial jury in the county in which the offense shall have been committed * * *."

1 doors."

2 Id. at 289 (emphasis added).

3 Finally, Justice Linde rejected the view that the open court guarantee 4 deprived judges of the authority, for good cause, to prevent a particular person from 5 attending a court proceeding:

6 "It is obvious, for reasons of space alone, that a guarantee of open courts 7 does not guarantee any one person a 'right' to be present. Justice is 8 nonetheless openly administered when one or another person is for good 9 cause prevented from attending."

10 Id. at 290.

11 In State ex rel KOIN-TV v. Olsen, 300 Or 392, 711 P2d 966 (1985), this 12 court addressed whether the operator of a television station was entitled to copy the 13 videotape of a defendant's testimony in a civil case. A party played the videotape as 14 evidence before a jury in open court, marked the videotape as an exhibit, and offered it in 15 evidence. The opposing party stated no objection, and the court received the videotape in 16 evidence. Later, the television station sought a copy of the videotape from the court.

17 The trial judge denied the request. The judge advanced several reasons for 18 the ruling, which this court summarized as follows:

19 "(1) The videotape was not truly an exhibit and had there been 20 objection to its offer in evidence, he would not have admitted it. (2) 21 [Plaintiff's] counsel had agreed in advance of taking the testimony by 22 videotape that the tape would not be disseminated outside the courtroom, 23 and the defendants certainly objected to the copying. (3) An exhibit is not 24 public property; it is the property of the owner. (4) To permit the copying 25 for television broadcasting would have a chilling effect on the use of a 26 valuable tool in moving the court's docket along. (5) There was no 27 statutory right to copy an exhibit."

28 Id. at 409. This court stated that the trial judge's reasons "are not sham or frivolous. He

1 was entirely correct in his assertion that the videotape was not truly an exhibit at all." Id.

2           The television station commenced a mandamus proceeding in this court, 3 seeking to overturn the trial court's refusal to allow the station to copy the videotape.
4 This court began by assuming arguendo that state statutes providing for the inspection 5 and copying of public records did not apply to courts, id. at 400, and proceeded to 6 determine whether the common law recognized a right of access to exhibits such as the 7 videotape. We consider the court's discussion of the common law in Olsen in the context 8 of this constitutional challenge to determine whether a claimed common law right to 9 inspect an exhibit was a part of the administration of justice to which Article I, section 10 10, applies.

11           The court in Olsen first considered several federal authorities that 12 distinguished between the court's records and files, on the one hand, and trial exhibits, on 13 the other hand. One older case, Ex parte Drawbaugh, 2 App DC 404 (1894), 14 acknowledged a common understanding that the public could inspect the court's records 15 and files, according to long-established usage in practice, but that case did not involve the 16 right to copy exhibits. Later federal cases, relying on Drawbaugh, concluded that a 17 common law right to copy exhibits existed, but that that right was not absolute and was 18 subject to the discretion of the court. See United States v. Mitchell, 551 F2d 1252 (DC 19 Cir 1976) (so holding; trial court abused its discretion in refusing to allow copying of 20 audio tapes). This court, in examining Mitchell, observed that much of the legal authority 21 relied on for that proposition did not exist, because the cited decisions did not concern 22 copying exhibits. Olsen, 300 Or at 403.

23           The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to review that

1 conclusion in Mitchell and stated:

2 "The few cases that have recognized such a right do agree that the decision 3 as to access is one best left to the sound discretion of the trial court, a 4 discretion to be exercised in light of the relevant facts and circumstances of 5 the particular case."

6 Nixon v. Warner Communications, Inc., 435 US 589, 599, 98 S Ct 1306, 55 L Ed 2d 570
7 (1978). The United States Supreme Court then reversed the lower court decision, 8 concluding, for reasons that are less than clear, that the trial court had not abused its 9 discretion in refusing to release the audiotapes to the media. Id. at 608.

10 In Olsen, after reviewing the foregoing federal authorities, this court 11 acknowledged that the Supreme Court's holding in Nixon apparently turned on the 12 discretionary authority of the trial court to control access to audiotapes admitted into 13 evidence. This court further noted that even the dissenting opinion of Justice Stevens in 14 Nixon had agreed that the trial judge's decision declining to allow the media to copy 15 audiotape exhibits was subject to reversal only for an abuse of discretion. 300 Or at 405.

16 This court in Olsen then cited and quoted two decisions from this court that 17 stated that, at common law, only persons who could show a need for the information 18 could assert a common law right to inspect or make copies of public records. Id. at 405-19 06 (citing MacEwan v. Holm et al, 226 Or 27, 35, 359 P2d 413 (1961); Bend Publishing 20 Co. v. Haner, 118 Or 105, 107, 244 P 868 (1926)). The court in Bend Publishing Co.
21 also concluded that an applicable statute granted the plaintiff a right to inspect and 22 examine the clerk's records for a lawful purpose. 118 Or at 109. The Olsen court 23 concluded from those cases that, in view of the narrow common law right to inspect 24 public records, it was "extremely doubtful that this court would have held there to be a

1 common-law right to copy exhibits." 300 Or 406.

2 To complete its analysis of the claimed right to copy exhibits, the Olsen
3 court assumed that a common law right existed to copy exhibits received in evidence 4 during the course of a civil trial. As to that assumed right, the court stated:

5 "We agree with the Nixon decision (and the dissent of Justice Stevens) that 6 the right is not absolute but is subject to the discretion of the trial judge.
7 That being so, in a proceeding in mandamus, we can overrule the trial 8 judge's decision only if we find there to have been an abuse of discretion."

9 Id. at 406-07 (footnote omitted). The court went on to conclude that the decision to deny 10 a copy of the videotape to the television station was not an abuse of discretion. Id. at 11 409.

12 This court's discussion in Olsen concerning Article I, section 10, was brief:

13 "There is not one iota of evidence in this proceeding to support a finding 14 that the trial in which the videotape was used was 'secret.' KOIN's 15 employees were admitted as were members of the public at large. Justice 16 was administered openly and without purchase."

17 Id. at 410. That holding is significant for our purposes in this case, because the Olsen
18 court gave no hint that the constitutional open courts provision granted the television 19 station the right to copy an exhibit that was different from -- or broader than -- the limited 20 common law right, which the court had discussed earlier, to request a copy of an exhibit 21 subject to the sound discretion of the trial judge.

22 The final case is O'Leary, 303 Or 297. In O'Leary, the plaintiff, Oregonian 23 Publishing Company, filed a declaratory judgment action challenging, under Article I, 24 section 10, a statute that required a court to hold a hearing "outside the presence of the 25 jury and the public" in criminal or grand jury proceedings where a witness refused to 26 testify on the ground that the witness may be incriminated by the testimony. 303 Or at

1 299 n 1 (quoting former ORS 136.617 (1987, amended by Or Laws 1991, ch 724 §
2 25(a)). This court held that the statute at issue violated Article I, section 10. Id. at 299.
3 After reviewing the history and the text, this court explained that the clause "is written in 4 absolute terms; there are no explicit qualifications to its command that justice be 5 administered openly." Id. at 302. This court further made clear that, "to be 6 constitutional, a proceeding must either not be secret or not 'administer justice' within the 7 meaning of section 10." Id. This court has also explained that the terms of Article I, 8 section 10, are unqualified and that a court may not balance, for example, a witness's 9 "secrecy interest" against the command of Article I, section 10. 303 Or at 304.

10           The court in O'Leary emphasized that Article I, section 10, is directed at 11 adjudications. 303 Or at 303. The court first asked whether the closed hearing outlined 12 in former ORS 136.617 (1987) was "an administration of justice within the meaning of 13 section 10." Id. The court noted that "not every proceeding involving the administration 14 of justice, in the general sense of that term, need be open to the public." Id. The court 15 continued, "To the extent that adjudications are not involved, the administration of justice 16 is not governed by [section 10]." Id. Ultimately, the court concluded that the hearings 17 outlined in former ORS 136.617 (1987) qualified as adjudications that fell within the 18 scope of Article I, section 10. Id. Because the statute required those hearings to be 19 closed to the public, the statute violated Article I, section 10. 303 Or at 305.

20           Deiz and O'Leary concerned the effect of Article I, section 10, on the 21 authority of a trial court to close a courtroom to the public or a part of the public. Olsen 22 addressed the application of Article I, section 10, in the context of a court's refusal to 23 allow the copying of a trial exhibit. It is clear that Olsen is the more pertinent authority

1 here. Nevertheless, intervenors argue that this court made strong statements in Deiz and 2 O'Leary about the breadth of the open courts provision and its important underlying 3 purpose. They point, for example, to the passage in O'Leary, quoted above, stating that 4 "the importance of visibility in the administration of justice goes far beyond the 5 presentation of admissible evidence at trial" and that open justice assures "accountability
6 for the * * * evidence used or not used." 303 Or at 304 (quoting Deiz, 289 Or at 288 7 (Linde, J., concurring)). From those passages, intervenors argue that a denial of access to 8 the exhibits in question will prevent the public from confirming, in a visible and tangible 9 way, that the court and jury have properly administered justice in the underlying case.

10           Intervenors have taken this court's statement in Deiz and O'Leary out of 11 context. Those statements confirm that a court does not comply with Article I, section 12 10, by confining the public's attendance in court to only the presentation of admissible 13 evidence. The principle of open justice entitles the public to attend and to view the other 14 aspects of the administration of justice in a court -- such as a proceeding to suppress 15 inadmissible evidence -- to ensure that the court and the parties comply with the law, and 16 appear to do so, in an accountable manner. The constitutional mandate for "the open and 17 visible administration of justice * * * that can be seen to be so during and after the 18 event," Deiz, 289 Or at 286 (Linde, J., concurring), does not entitle the public to inspect 19 every trial exhibit at the end of a trial. If that were the case, this court would have 20 decided Olsen differently. The accountability for evidence used and not used, to which 21 Justice Linde referred in Deiz, is the product of the public's right to see and hear a party's 22 efforts in court to introduce and use evidence, or decline to introduce or use evidence, 23 and to see and hear the court's decision in response to those efforts. But the constitutional

1 right to an open court does not create -- if we follow intervenors' logic -- a right in every 2 observer, at the end of a court proceeding, to obtain the release of the evidence admitted 3 or not admitted during the proceeding.

4           It cannot be gainsaid that the evidence in a case, consisting of documents 5 and other material property, may play an important, if not decisive, role in shaping the 6 strategy and arguments of the parties and the decisions of the court. As this case 7 illustrates, the public or the media may develop an interest in the content of exhibits or 8 other evidence introduced in a trial. Those circumstances, and other legitimate factors, 9 may lead a court to conclude that granting a request to inspect all or part of the evidence 10 in a case at the close of trial will foster public understanding of the administration of 11 justice despite any inconvenience, loss, embarrassment, or other negative consequence to 12 any person or entity that also may result from the inspection. But that may not be true in 13 every case.

14           We will not attempt to catalogue here the complete range of circumstances 15 in which a court permissibly may exercise its authority to limit the disclosure of exhibits, 16 as discussed above, at the close of a trial. We agree with the trial court, however, that 17 among those circumstances is the need to protect those who have been victims of child 18 sexual abuse and those who have reported suspected child sexual abuse to others with 19 authority to investigate, from embarrassment, retaliation, or other harm.

20           We have reviewed the trial court's decision in this case to redact the names 21 of child abuse victims and persons reporting suspected child abuse from the records that 22 the court ordered to be disclosed to intervenors at the conclusion of the trial. The court, 23 in our view, reasonably exercised its discretion to prevent undue injury and

1 embarrassment to innocent persons that likely would result from public disclosure of the 2 names in the exhibits.<sup>9</sup> See, Olsen, 300 Or at 406-07 ("[i]n a proceeding in mandamus, 3 we can overrule the trial judge's decision only if we find there to have been an abuse of 4 discretion").

5           Having concluded that the trial court's order requiring the redaction of the 6 names of the victims and the reporters of the alleged abuse prior to public release of the 7 ineligible volunteer file exhibits did not violate Article I, section 10, and was not an 8 abuse of discretion, we now turn to intervenors' second challenge to the trial court's order 9 regarding the trial court's decision to grant a stay of its order "pending appellate review." 10 Intervenor's primary argument is that Article I, section 10 does not permit public access to 11 the evidence to be denied pending completion of appellate review. Intervenor's also point 12 out that the trial court cited no authority -- no statute, rule, or case -- for its decision to 13 stay the release of the documents pending appellate review. We disagree with the 14 underpinnings of intervenor's argument. Because we conclude that Article I, section 10, 15 creates no absolute public right of access to trial exhibits at the close of trial, and

<sup>9</sup> As to the redaction of the names of alleged crime victims, courts have a history of protecting the identities of children in various types of cases, including cases, like this one, involving alleged sexual abuse. For example, in State v. McIntyre, 194 Or 415, 416, 242 P2d 189 (1952), this court referred to the minor victims as "John Doe" and "Richard Roe" in a criminal case alleging a "crime against nature." In State v. DuBois, 175 Or 341, 344, 153 P3d 521 (1944), this court referred to a minor female victim as "Miss X" because she was a "victim rather than an accomplice." Similarly, this court and the Court of Appeals have substituted initials or fictitious names for minors' names in case titles and in opinions. See, e.g., T. R. v. Boy Scouts of America, 344 Or 282, 181 P3d 758 (2008) (civil case involving alleged child sexual abuse); State ex rel Juv Dept v. Cornett, 121 Or App 264, 267 n 1, 855 P2d 171 (1993) (domestic relations and termination of parental rights proceeding, referring to children by initials in case title and throughout opinion).

1 therefore also conclude that the trial court's redaction of certain names in the ineligible
2 volunteer file exhibits did not violate Article I, section 10, we also conclude that the trial 3 court's decision to stay the effectiveness of its order pending appellate review did not 4 violate Article I, section 10.<sup>10</sup>

5           We summarize our conclusions as follows. In regard to the mandamus 6 petition of the BSA, we disagree with the trial court's reasoning in deciding that Article I, 7 section 10, required the court to dissolve its protective order concerning the lists of names 8 of alleged child sexual abuse victims and reporters of suspected child sexual abuse. The 9 trial court, however, sufficiently explained in the alternative that, if the court had 10 discretion in the matter, the court would choose to release the lists of names in a redacted 11 form. Upon review, we assume that any right to inspect exhibits at the close of trial was 12 subject to the trial court's discretion. The court reasonably exercised its discretion in all 13 the circumstances. Thus, there is no basis to grant relief in mandamus to the BSA.

14           In regard to the mandamus petition of intervenors, we conclude, as noted, 15 that the open courts provision in Article I, section 10, did not require the trial court, at the 16 end of a trial, to order the release of exhibits that were subject to an earlier protective 17 order requiring that the parties maintain their confidentiality at the close of trial. The <sup>10</sup> We do not seek by our decision to encourage trial courts generally to refuse access to trial exhibits at the end of a trial. As we have endeavored to make clear, this court will evaluate any decision to deny access to a trial exhibit to determine whether it reflects a reasonable exercise of discretion. We also point out that our decision does not concern public access to the case files of the court, an issue that may call for a different legal analysis.

1 abuse and reporters of child sexual abuse from embarrassment, retaliation, or other harm.
2 The court in this case properly exercised that authority. Additionally, the court did not 3 violate Article I, section 10, by staying the effectiveness of its disclosure order pending 4 appellate review.

5 The alternative writs of mandamus are dismissed.
